In a moment of growing success for those institutions that are concerned with the mediation of architecture and given the fact that a contamination between the role of the art curator and the one of the architecture curator is occurring, the following issues define a complex base that represent a seminal starting point for investigations on architecture exhibitions both from a scientific and a design point of view: What happens when architecture, being a used object, becomes an exhibited one? Which mutations occur in the techniques, the dimensions, the media and the places of the representation and of the presentation of architecture when it becomes collected and exhibited? To which rules is the process of reception of the ‘architecture exhibition’ subject to?

One of the aims of the communication of architecture is to make a spatial experience accessible to the public, but when tools that are created for the representation of architecture are used in the exhibition instead of those that are necessary for its presentation, an essential aspect of the mediation process is neglected. This project’s aim was to realise a study about the definition of the ‘architecture exhibition’ basing on some key episodes in this field taken from the past and from the present.
The research project Mostrare Architettura led to a first mapping of some of the possible approaches related to the presentation of architecture and to the mediation of the contents of the architectural project through the exhibition practices.

The initiative organised within the framework of the research project have enabled fruitful exchanges with some relevant international institutions with whom possible future developments of the project can be imagined (CCA Montreal, Architekturmuseum der TU München, London Design Museum, Bureau Europa Maastricht).
